One of the ways The Parenting Center maintains its mission is through its Family Life Education program. Our highly skilled and caring staff cover more than 50 relevant topics in our parenting classes.

We are here at every stage of development, birth to teen, to assist parents in nurturing and guiding their children.

We know parenting isn't easy. That is why our classes are available at our office, online, as well as other locations throughout the Metroplex. Online registrations are simple and fast, or you can call us, we'll be glad to help.

Classes are taught by trained, degreed, and experienced professionals. Our goal is to deliver quality, research-based instruction on

How to Correct Misbehavior

by Suzanne Stevenson

Spanking is often viewed as a time-honored method for punishing misbehavior. It is done in the belief that it will stop unwanted behavior because we, as adults, remember a spanking that taught us a lesson after which we never repeated our misdeed.

However, there is plenty of research that counters the belief in the effectiveness of spanking for stopping misbehavior in children. In arecent study conducted by George Holden at Southern Methodist University, it was revealed that corporal punishment is not the most effective method for ending unwanted behavior or correcting misbehavior. In fact, the study demonstrates that spanking is often used for minor misbehaviors or with children who are very young and are simply behaving in a developmentally appropriate way. Spanking rarely accomplishes the overall goal of modifying behavior and as the study demonstrated, children responded with more misbehavior within 10 minutes of the spanking. What is a parent to do?
